DO WE NEED DETENTION OR NOT?

Detention can be a very effective form of punishment. It can stop students from misbehaving and help them reflect on their action. Detention helps students realise their mistakes, giving them an opportunity to correct themselves and become better beings.

Yes, detention can be used, but not for all.

Children love to share lunch and have a good time playing with friends. If that time is taken away, one will soon learn to be disciplined, but not in a fun way. Children may also hate the teachers.

So, in conclusion, detention can be used, but the better method could be that the teacher disciplines the students efficiently in a friendly manner.

BACK FROM THE FOSSILS

Have you always wanted to know if in a battle our typical tiger will win over a sabre-toothed tiger? Or regret having missed your chance to see a real-life dodo. Well, the wait is over. You could expect to see these creatures soon.

Bringing an extinct species back to life sounds like magic, but it's possible with our magic called science. But this isn't a one-day job; it could take years if not decades to achieve this crazy idea. And the good news is scientists have already started working on it.

De-extinction is a process where scientists use molecular tools to edit the genomes of present animals so that some of their DNA sequences are changed to look like that of extinct animals. This way after many generations we will be able to see elephants with mammoth traits and pigeons with passenger pigeon traits.

This is possible because of the DNA retained in their fossils. The limit of DNA survival which we can use for de-extinction is around one million years or less. So, sorry dinosaur lovers there's not going to be a Jurassic Park in the future.

However, nothing is certain, this revolution can take years to be a reality. So turn on your creativity and be prepared to get amazed.
